

I am saddened and disturbed by this morning's ruling. I am also appalled that FCC officials would maintain that the public's previous comments concerning the vote were "non-technical" and therefore carried no weight in considering the issue. If the FCC maintains that they will not look to public opinion when deciding upon matters such as these, then they ought not to solicit such feedback, as it ultimately proves fruitless and inconsequential. I would like to note that the dissenting opinions put forth by Mr. Copps and Mr. Adelstein were elegantly presented and argued.
